Red Ant Killer

Did you ever hear of a household that didn't have an ant remedy? How many of these same households are not looking for a remedy that will really work? L. Hausman of the Missouri Agricultural Experiment Station has been giving special attention to the little red ant that usually causes more trouble than any other and has been able to kill it with the syrup made from half a pound of sugar and a fortieth of an ounce of sodium arsenate. The syrup should be made in a double boiler because if it is scorched the ants will not eat it and the poison must be carefully weighed by the druggist and no more than this must be added for two reasons. (1) It is a deadly poison and will be more likely to be dangerous to animals or persons who get it by mistake if less diluted. (2) If any more of it is used, the ants detect the taste and will not eat it.

Professor Hausman says that the ant has a very keen sense of taste and it is a most contrary creature refusing to eat many of the things usually used in trying to get rid of him. In fact he finds that the little red nuisance eats this arsenic syrup better if it is put on sponges, rags or blotting paper so it is seemingly harder to get rid of in an open dish. If the soaked sponges or rags are put into tin cans or glass jars closed up except for a little crack as though put away to avoid the ants they seem to make special search for it and pass by open dishes of it in favor of the closed vessel.

Professor Hausman recommends this poison especially for the little red ants and says that the real way to get rid of any kind of ants whose nests can be found is to destroy the entire colony with boiling water or by pouring on carbon bisulphide which will choke or suffocate them if placed so that its poison gas can settle down into the nest.
